Arrangement

Structure and function of a typical flower

A flower is a specialized reproductive shoot producing seeds which give rise to the next generation. The flower parts are attached to the receptacle in rings, or whorls. The innermost whorl of one or more carpels is encircled by a whorl of stamens. In most flowers, these reproductive organs are surrounded by a whorl of petals. Coloured, scented petals with a nectary at the base attract insects which, as they collect nectar, bring about cross-pollination by transferring pollen from the anthers of one flower to the stigma of another. An outer whorl of leaflike sepals encloses and protects the other flower parts as they develop at the bud stage.

Racemose inflorescences

Cymose inflorescences

Mixed inflorescence

Most coniferous forests are in cold northern regions. The conical shape of the trees both supports snow and sheds it rapidly when it thaws. The evergreen needlelike leaves are resistant to freezing and their waxy surface reduces water loss in areas where frozen ground makes little water available to the tree

Plant habitats

The natural vegetation of a region is largely determined by climate. The boreal forest or taiga of the N hemisphere, for example, is coniferous because the climate is too severe for deciduous trees to survive. A major ecological division or biome (eg scrub or tundra) includes all those regions with a broadly similar vegetation and climate – the scrub biome for instance, includes the Mediterranean maquis, the N American chaparral, and the European heathland Tundra Plants of this region are supported by a thin layer of usually waterlogged soil above the permanently frozen subsoil (permafrost). Berry-bearing woody shrubs (eg cranberry and bilberry), mosses and lichens, and forests of dwarf birch and willow grow here, typically in dense low cushions.

Alpine zone The vegetation that grows between the tree line and the snow line of mountains is similar to that of the Arctic tundra. In summer, both areas are briefly covered with low-growing, brightly coloured flowers such as saxifrages and cranesbills.

Grassland The N American prairie, Eurasian steppe, S American pampa, S African veld, and the tropical savanna are the major areas of the 45 million km² (18 million mi²) grassland biome. Grasses grow successfully where other plants cannot survive, chiefly because their growing point is near the base of the plant. This allows them to grow back rapidly after grazing by animals, cutting, or fire.

Rain forest The hot wet climate of the tropical rain forest supports the lushest and most varied vegetation on earth. Below the three layers of broad-leaved evergreen trees is a layer of palms, bamboos, saplings, and woody shrubs, and below that a ground layer of seedlings, flowering plants, and club mosses.

Epiphytes including ferns, lichens, fungi, orchids, and bromeliads live attached to and supported by practically every tree trunk and plant stem.

Lianas and other woody plants rooted in the forest floor climb towards the sunlight using the trees as a support. 'Strangling' plants begin as epiphytes on tree branches and grow down the trunk, enclosing it in a mesh of woody roots which may eventually kill the tree.

Desert Plants adapted to withstand long periods of drought (xerophytes) are often leafless and spherical or cylindrical in shape, so that the surface area from which water can evaporate is small by comparison with the plant's volume.

Cacti and other succulents store water in their fleshy stems or leaves which are often covered with sharp spines to protect the plant from animals.

Mesquites have roots that grow to a depth of 15 m (50 ft) to tap underground water resources.

Shallow roots that extend over a wide area rapidly soak up any rain that falls.

Plant divisions

The plant kingdom can be divided into higher or seed-bearing plants and lower (non seed bearing) plants. More detailed classification, particularly of the lower plants, varies considerably and in many systems bacteria, fungi and algae are excluded from both the plant and animal kingdoms.

Seaweed and blue-green algae live in aquatic environments. Although blue-green algae can photosynthesise and most bacteria cannot, they are classed together because of the similarity of their simple cell structure. That of practically every other living organism, like animals.

Thallophytes have a plant body not differentiated into leaves, stems, and roots. This diverse group of organisms includes the yeasts, moulds, mushrooms and toadstools which live as parasites or saprophytes wherever organic matter is available, and algae ranging from minute single celled varieties to giant seaweeds up to 100 m (328 ft) long.

lichens

Bryophytes are small primitive land plants with no true roots or water conducting tissue. They absorb water through their surface and are most abundant in damp areas such as bogs, river banks and in tropical climates.

liverworts

mosses

Pteridophytes were the dominant plants in the vast forests of the Carboniferous period 300 million years ago. Like the higher plants they have vascular tissue for food and water conduction but they reproduce by means of spores rather than seeds.

club mosses

ferns

horsetails

Spermatophytes are seed bearing plants and include the Gymnosperms and Angiosperms.

Gymnosperms are the oldest group of seed bearing plants. Included in this group of woody, mostly evergreen trees and shrubs are the yews, the tropical palmlike cycads, the ginkgo or maidenhair tree, now practically extinct, and the conifers which bear the seeds on scales arranged in cones.

cycads

iris

Angiosperms (flowering plants)

Monocotyledons typically have long narrow leaves with parallel veins. All the grasses, the rushes, palms, and the highly evolved lilies, orchids, and irises belong to this group.

dog rose

Dicotyledons are usually broad leaved plants. Most garden plants and flowering trees are included in this category which contains over threequarters of all flowering plants.

The reproductive system

female

male

Pregnancy

The diagram on the right shows a foetus at full term – that is, when it is ready to be born. Pregnancy is usually 40 weeks long, the estimated birth date being calculated from the first day of the last menstrual period.

Menstrual cycle

The menstrual cycle is, on average, 28 days long though it is frequently shorter or longer than this. The day on which menstruation begins is counted as the first day of the cycle, and at the same time an ovum begins to develop in a follicle in the ovary. This ovum is released on or about the fourteenth day. It then passes down the fallopian tube to the uterus where, if the ovum has been fertilized, it embeds itself in the lining and starts to develop. If the ovum has not been fertilized it passes out of the uterus with the menstrual flow.
